THE HEDGEHOG

STORY GAIDEN

ストーリー外伝

THE LEGEND BEGINS

It has been said that ever since man began to walk on two legs, he started to yearn for the sky and for unknown speeds.

In the year 1974, there were two ace pilots on the American Air Force. One of them was historically the first man to cross over the speed-of-sound barrier, Chuck Yeager. The other man was Henry Gordon. Due to his sharp technique, he was called "Hedgehog".

On account of his nickname, Henry had a hedgehog emblem sewn onto his flight jacket, which soon became his trademark.

One day, Chuck and Henry were summoned to headquarters, where they received orders to test out the new fighter aircraft. This was to be the beginning of their supersonic challenge.

THE MAN WHO BECAME A LEGEND

On the day of the test flight, Chuck and Henry wished each other luck and exchanged flight jackets. It was a gesture to show that the two men recognized each other as equals.

The two newly designed jet fighters flew across the skies of Arizona. Fighter unit 1, which was piloted by Henry, was the first to start the supersonic challenge. Amidst the narrowing field of vision, Henry continued to stay in contact over the radio. While feeling the severe G-force, Henry pushed the throttle forward. On ground, fighter unit 1's velocity was continuously being measured at the base. Accompanied by a "boom" sound, fighter unit 1 finally broke the sound barrier. Happy cheers broke out all over base. Henry also let out a shout of joy. But at that very moment, fighter unit 1 in which Henry was riding, mercilessly exploded. He disappeared from the radar. Appromaximately 20 minutes later, Chuck, riding in fighter unit 2, managed to break the sound barrier safely, and landed on the ground.

Thus, Chuck was the one who ended up in the history books. Even with all the praise he received day after day, a thorn remained in Chuck's heart, though he never told anyone, not even his family, he felt it was inexcusable how Henry had seemingly been pushed under the shadow of history.

Chuck made a decision. For as long as he lived, he would make sure Henry was remembered. He started wearing Henry's flight jacket. He named the jacket "Sonic the Hedgehog" (after Henry's nickname).

THE LEGEND TURNS A NEW PAGE

Seeing the Flight Jacket worn by Chuck, the other pilots who remembered Henry started to attach "Sonic the Hedgehog" emblems to their own jackets. For some mysterious reason, among the pilots who wore the Sonic Emblem, no one suffered an accident.

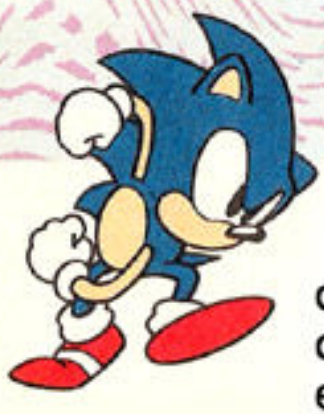
10 years went by. The "Sonic the Hedgehog" emblem was in high demand by the airforce pilots. However, by this time not many knew about Henry, and no one talked of him anymore.

One day, Chuck took with him the "Sonic the Hedgehog" flight jacket and went to visit the Gordon family. There he was met by Henry's daughter Meg, who was now an adult. She was currently making a living as a freelance cameraman.

Meg and Chuck talked about their old memories of Henry, and when he left Chuck gently handed over the Flight Jacket to her.

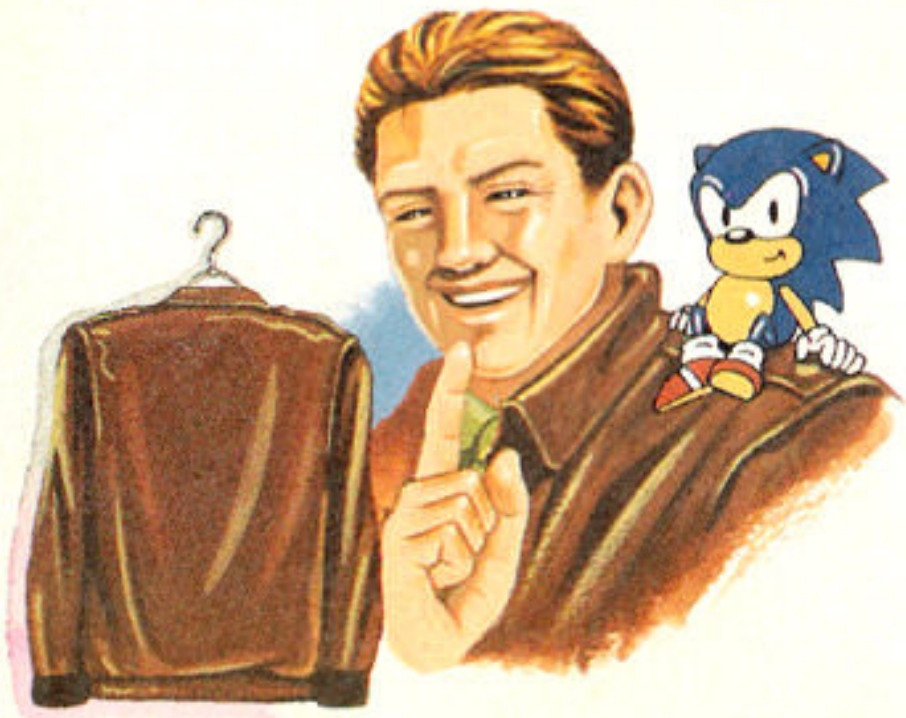
As she put on the Sonic flight jacket, Meg felt inexplicably calm. When she wore it, it felt as if her father was watching over her.

One day, Meg was doing coverage of an aviation show that was being held on an airport in the suburbs. Naturally, she was wearing the Sonic jacket. Suddenly, an accident occured.



During the acrobat aviation, two planes lost their balance and collided. One of them fell headlong into the press box. The crash caused a huge fire to break out, and Meg was unable to escape. Surrounded by bursting flames, Meg searched desparately for a way out, but started to lose consciousness.

Then, she felt someone frantically smacking her cheek. Admidst her fading consciousness, she saw Sonic the Hedgehog. With a gentle smile, Sonic reached out his hand to Meg. "This way, Meg. This way!" he said. Meg staggered her way to where Sonic was standing. It was like his smile gave her a burst of courage and drew her towards him. She was taken by his friendly expression. Meg begun to move faster after him. However, Meg's consciousness finally gave way. Just before she blacked out, she saw Sonic waving his index finger left and right, she felt she wanted to smile. That was the same gesture her father used to make.



When she woke up, she was in a hospital bed. It appeared she had been asleep for a week. Meg begun to look around for the Sonic jacket, she was relieved when she saw the somewhat sooty jacket on a hanger. The nurse handed her the jacket, and she embraced it. However, Sonic was no longer on it.
